LAST LINES

‘My Edward and I are very happy together. And the happiness of the people we love most makes us even happier.’	‘With these words Marlow finished his story. He sat apart and silent. Nobody on board the Nellie moved for a time. The sky was dark and the river was black, seeming to lead into the heart of an immense darkness.’	‘I remembered the time when he had stretched out his arms to the green light at the end of Daisy’s dock. His dream probably seemed so close that he couldn’t fail to get hold of it. He did not know that it was already behind him.’
‘The man on the floor was wrinkled and old and he had an evil face. It was not till they examined the rings that they recognised who it was.’	‘Then he may be seen running at the head of the pack through the pale moonlight. He is gigantic and his great throat howls out the song of the younger world, which is the song of the pack.’	‘She looked at the steps; they were empty. She looked at the picture. Then she drew a line in the centre. It was done; it was finished. “Yes”, she thought, laying down her brush exhausted, “I’ve had my vision.”’
